Module Eight

Before reorganizing my portfolio, there were no categories or folders. After re-organizing, I set up two main folders for my repo folder. The first is simply titled "Portfolio" because that is where all of the documents pertaining to the design of my actual portfolio will be. The next folder, "Alumni Portfolio Inspiration" contains earlier documents that pertained to the first few modules. I did this because it easily separates my actual documents from the documents, which served as a reference. Within the Portfolio folder are three subfolders: Design Docs, Sitemaps, and Wireframes. I chose to do this because each subfolder contains three or four files. This helps with navigation because I can jump straight to the step in the design process I am currently working on or need to reference. Although having three tiers of folders creates less immediate visibility for all of the files in my repo, I think the hierarchy works well usability-wise. The folder names are general enough to not be confusing and specific enough to create a highly organized repo space.
